Drioli wants to celebrate, and Chaim asks if they are celebrating Drioli who divorces from his wife to be able to marry her. Dressed with a messy black coat, he looks cold and miserable, and obviously hungry when he passes in front of a bar with the weak roast chicken smell. Drioli progresses into drunkenness, feeling that his feet do not belong to him as he begins to float. The narrator concludes the story with the hope that Drioli is still good, so much more than in Cannes there is no Bristol hotel. After a while, Drioli rises from the ground, turns off the light and asks Chaim to tattoo his back with one of him. Thirty years ago, Soutine was in love with Drioli is still good, so much more than in Cannes there is no Bristol hotel. to paint a photo on the back of Drioli and then tattoo her above her. When Drioli meets soutine, it's still a young man asking the poor friend artist to tattoo a portrait on his back. During a meeting with Chaim, Drioli enters the apartment with several bottles of wine and chafing chaim as he paints a portrait of Drioli's wife. Passing from a gallery, he stops when he sees a painting of Chaim Soutine. As a tattoo artist, Drioli trusts what he is talking about, telling the difficult customers that he has previously tattooed himself to witness of him's competence. The tunnel's patrols look with amazement the beautiful tattoo, and someone is offered to buy it. The narrator reveals that the Bristol hotel does not exist and that Drioli was probably murdered. He ends the memory of Chaim, and remembers that after the First World War he lost his contacts with the boy, probably taken by a merchant of art. When the clients see the tattoo of drioi, their immediate thought is to buy the piece, rather than really appreciates the work. Later, a painting «heavily painted» of the same subject is for sale in Buenos The artist asks for a nude study of Josie, but refuses to tattoo the photo on Drioli's back. Driols. The murder is also a metaphor of thread availability in the eyes of the rich, and the tragedy of the sale of the art that his friend has done, an authentic residue of hospitality and the care of his friend who is completely separated by Any monetary gain, in a corrupt art market and avid post-war world. However, there is no direct sentence that says it and therefore nobody really knows what they happen to drio. When Drioli remembers the tattoo of him from 1913, he also remembers WWI. The bizarre and soutine macabre paintings complete the history, as the end of the part of the piece reflects the strange quality of the soutine canvases. At the end of the Drioli he agrees to go with the alleged owner of the Bristol hotel, and a few weeks after a soutine framework, with a woman's head painted in an unusual way, is for sale in Buenos Aires. Drioli appreciates the work of soutine only for the artistic value of him, as soutines did not successfully sell the works of him in 1913. The artist paints him drawing on his back of drioi, and then begins to tattoo. The owner of the Hotel Bristol in Cannes tries to strendaries promising beautiful women, food and wine. However, the patronage do not see it as a human being, but rather like a walking canvas, a vehicle of wealth and prosperity. The implication is that Drioli was killed to get art on his back. Chaim suggests painting a picture on the back of threads, and Drioli can refuse to bathe as a testimony of the art of Chaim. But until the death of man, the tattoo is worth nothing because it is still part of him. He contrasts him directly with the patrons of the gallery at the end of history. While Drioli evaluates his friend enough to put the art of him on his body, people in the gallery enhance art only as a material possession. In "Skin", Roald Dahl uses a flashback, and a famous historical figure, to emphasize the depravation and exclusivity of the art world. He is also present in A Roald Dahl Selection, a collection of different stories of Dahl curated by Roy Bartchford. Including Chaim Soutine, a famous Russian-French expressionist painter of the beginning of the 20th century, Dahl adds gravity to the piece of him, as the main character of him describes interactions (fictitious) with a real historical
